

Facts, Not Permission

[Intro: low, amused smirk, conversational]

Yeah, let me make this shit simple and plain,
'cause apparently somebody got lost in the lane.
If I talk about my baby mama, hear facts.
That's the truth that I give, and I stand on that.

But don't get it twisted, don't twist what I said.
My truth isn't permission to disrespect.
You don't get to listen when I open that door,
then walk out believing you can talk down some more.

I gave you the facts.
I didn't give you her.
That's the line right there.
Don't blur that shit, sir.

[Verse 1: tight anapestic drill pocket]

I can tell you the scars and the flaws and the breaks, every promise that cracked, every choice and mistake.
I can tell you where she hurt me, where I did damage too, where the pressure got heavy and the whole thing came through.

I'll give you the raw and the ugly and real,
every wound that was hidden, each cut that could heal.
No spin for the public, no polished disguise,
but don't take my truth and weaponize.

'Cause I gave you the facts, not a target to chase.
I gave you the truth, not permission for hate.
You don't get to hear me describe what went wrong, then decide that her name is your place to get strong.

You know one little story.
I know the whole woman.
You heard one little chapter.
I lived through the novel.

[Pre-Chorus: intimate, restrained]

You heard that she hurt me.
You thought that meant hate.
You heard that I loved her.
You forgot to translate.

Pain doesn't cancel the love that was there.
A heart can get broken and still fucking care.

[Chorus: heavy drill bounce]

Facts, not permission, that's all that I gave.
I told you the truth, I didn't hand you a blade.
I can speak on the pain, I can tell you the scars,
but don't take my history and make it your war.

Facts, not permission, don't cross that damn line.
Her mistakes aren't a license to disrespect mine.
I can tell you she hurt me and still love her too.
That's a concept apparently foreign to you.

[Verse 2: faster anapestic cadence, sarcastic edge]
It's amusing how quickly a mouth finds a throne, when a person hears pieces and thinks that they know.
Got a fraction of context, now suddenly wise,
with a verdict prepared and that look in their eyes.

Nah, sit down.

You don't know what I know.
You don't know where we started.
You don't know where we go.

You don't know the laughter.
You don't know the tears.
You don't know what survived through the hardest damn years.

You know what I told you.
That's all that you know.
So don't turn my memories into your little show.

I can tell you she fucked up.
I can tell you I did.
I can tell you we both had some shit that we hid.

But if hearing my truth makes you eager to sneer,
then you weren't hearing truth.

You were hunting for fear.

[Beat drop: one bar silence]

Wrong fucking lesson.

[Verse 3: snarling, heavier pocket]
See, I don't need your hatred to validate pain.
I don't need you degrading her name for my gain.
I don't need you attacking the woman I knew just because I got honest when talking to you.

That's weak.

I can carry my wounds without handing them out.
I can speak about love without drowning in doubt.
I can tell you the truth without turning cruel.
I can hold two damn thoughts without acting a fool.

She isn't a saint.
I'm not either, that's true.
But perfection was never the damn point to begin to.

The point is the life that came out of the two,
the permanent proof of what we once went through.

A whole little person.
A future in motion.
A bloodline continuing past every emotion.

So don't bring her name with contempt in your mouth.
If I gave you the truth, that's where the truth stops.

Facts, not permission, that's all that I gave.
I told you the truth, I didn't hand you a blade.
I can speak on the pain, I can tell you the scars,
but don't take my history and make it your war.
Let me run that back.
Facts, not permission, don't cross that damn line.
Her mistakes aren't a license to disrespect mine.
I can tell you she hurt me and still love her too.
That's a concept apparently foreign to you.

And yeah, I loved her.

Maybe love changed shape.
Maybe two people can love and still separate.
Maybe romance is something that sometimes gets lost, while respect keeps standing and counting the cost.
Maybe love ain't a house that you have to remain in.
Maybe love is a scar
that's honored to be there.
Maybe love is a memory
you carry with grace.
Maybe love is a child with her eyes in your face.

And if that's hard to understand,
that's fine.

But don't make your confusion
a problem of mine.

So if you talk down about her, don't do it around me.
Not because she's perfect.
Because our love will spend generations finally free.

I can disagree with her.
I can fight with her too.
I can tell you the truth about shit that she knew.

You know what happened.
I know what it means.
Facts, not permission, remember the line.
I can speak on her truth and still say she is mine.
Not mine like possession, not mine like control,
mine in the bloodline, the history, the soul.
Facts, not permission, don't twist what I say.
I can carry the love though the romance decayed.
I can remember the pain without turning to hate.
I can honor the past without pretending it's great.
You heard me speak facts.
You thought that meant attack.
No.
You misunderstood.

So yeah, I'll tell you the truth about her.
Every beautiful piece.
Every ugly piece.
Every scar.
Every memory.

But don't confuse my honesty
with permission.
I can speak facts
and still protect her name.
I can remember the pain and still honor what we made.
I can love her without pretending we're perfect.
That's my baby mama.
That's my bloodline.
That's somebody I loved.
That's somebody I still respect.

And if you can't understand how those truths coexist, that's your limitation.
Not mine.
Facts.
Not permission.
From this life.
into whatever comes next.